

AS A PC USER, I stand to benefit from Access BPL. But, as much as I'd like more connectivity options, dial-up is my only option. I don't think we should pay the price of interfering with all these other forms of communication. Japan has already decided, based on interference studies done there, that the time is not yet right for Access BPL, pending improvements in the technology. The BBC, in a test in the UK, found BPL to cause significant interference.

For that reason, I'm asking the FCC to let power lines remain just that and leave broadband Internet to the cable television and telephone companies whose technologies best support it.
